Surprise parties are polarizing. People who love them really love them. People who hate them really hate them. According to Business Wire, Get the guest of honor s to help plan the party without telling them about it by carefully investigating their party-related likes and dislikes. Use natural conversation to bring these ideas up, otherwise you might give it away. Friends, family, coworkers, and event stakeholders who are close to the guest of honor can all chip in their two cents. Pro tip: Reserve the sleuthing for someone with a great poker face. You can plan a surprise party all by yourself. But if you have friends, family, or coworkers who are willing to help you out, add the following roles to your mini planning committee:.

To learn how to plan a surprise party, you need a checklist tool to track all tasks and a communication tool to coordinate everyone involved. The most popular tools for for planning surprise parties include:. Or, go with one near an area they already spend time in. The budget for a surprise party varies depending on guest count, location, level of formality, and much more. But there are always ways to trim the costs a bit.

Here are a few options to consider:. Follow the traditional dates and time of day used for that party type. For example, weddings typically take place during the afternoon, so a surprise wedding party should do the same. One to three weeks before their actual birthday will do the trick. You can also share your plans with your guests and designate entrances and exits for individual groups. Less is more when it comes to decorations — create one large focal point the guest of honor will see when they walk into the main party room, and plan tables and chairs around that. The point of a surprise party is the surprise, and if there are too many decorations around, your guest of honor will be tipped off before they even see all of the guests. A banner, some streamers, and a balloon or two will be more than enough.

Add some relaxed activities to your surprise party plan to take the heat off of the guest of honor so they can mix and mingle. Board games, poker, and a DIY cupcake bar area all great choices, but it will of course vary depending on the type of surprise party. Brainstorm what makes the most sense for the guest of honor and all of the attendees and go from there. Did you and the guest of honor frequent the pool hall in college? Consider choosing a venue with pool tables. Is the guest of honor your boss who loves darts? Set up a few dart boards throughout the location. The options are endless — this is where creativity is incredibly important! Once again, this step will depend on the type of surprise party. If you choose to create a menu for a full meal, go with something you know the host will love. Save on setup and cleanup time, plus help keep the secret under wraps for as long as possible, by ordering takeout or delivery set for after the guest of honor arrives.

Digital invitations are the most discreet and easiest to hide. Send your invitations one month to two weeks ahead of time and collect RSVPs a week in advance. Include parking and entrance instructions for those who want to jump out and surprise the guests. This is another time that having some sort of communication tool or app will come in handy. To surprise the guest of honor on the day of the party, create a decoy plan. If the party is catered, share the floor plan you made with your chef and finalize arrival times for party staff. Order any baked goods for the day before or morning of. Use Spotify or another similar music app to come up with a playlist of relaxed beats, classic jazz, or top 40 hits the guest of honor will love to set the tone for the party.

You can always mix it up, too. What makes sense during the surprise portion of the party might not make sense later on in the night. If you do a virtual surprise party, ask everyone to leave their meeting IDs blank or change it to an appropriate party greeting.
